A PRIMER ON PREJUDICIAL ERROR: THE APPLICABLE TESTS AND HOW TO SATISFY THEM

By: Dallas Sacher
(slightly edited and presented by Paul Couenhoven)

INTRODUCTION

As is recognized by any experienced appellate practitioner, the main obstacle in winning an appeal is not to demonstrate error, but to establish the error compels reversal. The purpose of this article is to assist appellate counsel in persuading an appellate court that either precedent or basic fairness require that reversal of a conviction or sentence.

This article has a dual focus. First, an attempt has been made to set forth the applicable standards of prejudice. Second, the article also contains some thoughts as to how these standards may be satisfied. With respect to this second aspect of the article, I have also included a discussion suggesting how "routine" state law error may be successfully categorized as federal constitutional error. Given the reluctance of most California state courts to find reversible error, it is incumbent upon appellate counsel to raise and exhaust any federal issue which will allow for the filing of a federal petition for writ of habeas corpus.

Finally, the reader who desires additional discussion may wish to review Charles Sevilla's excellent 1981 article entitled "A Pool of Prejudice: Prejudicial, Reversible And Harmless Errors on Appeal." The article can be found in the 1982 edition of the State Public Defender's Criminal Appellate Practice Manual. Although the article is dated, it contains an authoritative section on case specific factors which may be used to show prejudice in a particular appeal.

I. ERRORS THAT ARE REVERSIBLE PER SE.

Although the California Supreme Court has generally taken its lead from the United States Supreme Court, it has not categorically done so with respect to the question of what errors require reversal per se. Thus, for the moment, California law is somewhat more helpful than federal law.

A. The Federal Rule

In the landmark case of Rose v. Clark (1986) 478 U.S. 570, the court announced that virtually all constitutional errors are subject to harmless error analysis. (Id., at pp. 576-578.) The sole exception to this rule are those errors which are termed "structural" in nature. (Arizona v. Fulminante (1991) 499 U.S. 279, 310.) In order to qualify as a "structural" error, a constitutional deprivation must affect "the framework within which the trial proceeds, rather than simply an error in the trial process itself." (Ibid.)

In United States v. Gonzalez-Lopez (2006) 548 U.S. 140, 149, fn. 4 the Supreme Court suggested that some errors must necessarily be deemed structural, and therefore reversible per se, in light of the "difficulty of assessing the effect of the error."

The list of "structural errors" includes: (1) the total deprivation of the right to counsel at trial; (2) a proceeding held before a biased judge; (3) the exclusion of prospective jurors on racial grounds; (4) the denial of the defendant's right to self representation; (5) the denial of a public trial; (6) a directed verdict in favor of the state; (7) the deprivation of a jury trial where guaranteed by the Constitution; (8) an improper instruction which dilutes the standard of proof beyond a reasonable doubt; (9) the involuntary medicating of the defendant at trial; (10) a defense lawyer's failure to file a notice of appeal upon the defendant's timely request; and (11) the deprivation of the right to counsel of choice. (United States v. Gonzalez-Lopez, supra, 548 U.S. 140, 149; Roe v. Flores-Ortega (2000) 528 U.S. 470, 486; Sullivan v. Louisiana (1993) 508 U.S. 275, 279; Riggins v. Nevada (1992) 504 U.S. 127, 137-138; Fulminante, supra, 499 U.S. at pp. 309-310; Rose, supra, 478 U.S. at pp. 577-578.)

Appellate counsel should not hesitate to make good faith arguments for expansion of the list. So long as the error is one which impacts on the "framework" of the legal process, a "structural" error may be reasonably found. Thus, the lower federal courts have identified several additional "structural" errors: (1) state invasion of the attorney-client relationship (Shillinger v. Haworth (10th Cir. 1995) 70 F.3d 1132, 1141-1142); (2) the judge's absence from trial (Riley v. Deeds (9th Cir. 1995) 56 F.3d 1117, 1119); (3) defense counsel's coercion of defendant to waive a jury trial (Frazer v. United States (9th Cir. 1994) 18 F.3d 778, 785); (4) exclusion of material defense evidence (Dey v. Scully (E.D.N.Y. 1997) 952 F.Supp. 957, 974-976); (5) allowing the jury to hear audiotapes during deliberations when the tapes had not been admitted into evidence (United States v. Noushfar (9th Cir. 1996) 78 F.3d 1442, 1444-1446, modified at 140 F.3d 1244); (6) allowing the jury to be tainted by biased remarks delivered by a prospective juror during voir dire (Mach v. Stewart (9th Cir. 1998) 137 F.3d 630, 633-634); (7) presence of a biased juror (Dyer v. Calderon (9th Cir. 1998) 151 F.3d 970, 973, fn. 2); (8) the prosecutor's breach of a plea bargain (Dunn v. Colleran (3rd Cir. 2001) 247 F.3d 450, 461-462); and (9) an ex post facto violation (Williams v. Roe (9th Cir. 2005) 421 F.3d 883, 888). Aside from the cited cases, a helpful discussion and additional cases on "structural error" can be found at 2 Hertz and Liebman, Federal Habeas Corpus Practice and Procedure (5th ed. 2005) chapter 31.3, pp. 1517-1531.) Keep in mind some of these cases are now over 10 years old, and their conclusion structural error occurred may be questioned in the light of more recent Supreme Court analysis.

For example, one could argue the failure to give an instruction on the defense theory of the case is structural error because it impacts the very framework in hwich a trial is conducted. In United States v. Escobar De Bright (9th Cir. 1984) 742 F.2d 1196 the defendant was charged with the conspiracy to sell drugs. Although there was substantial evidence that the defendant had conspired with a government agent, the trial court refused to instruct the jury on the defendant's theory that a conspiracy conviction cannot be found where the only co-conspirator is a government agent. After finding that the instruction should have been given, the Court of Appeals held that the error was reversible per se:

> "The right to have the jury instructed as to the defendant's theory of the case is one of those rights `so basic to a fair trial' that failure to instruct where there is evidence to support the instruction can never be considered harmless error. Jurors are required to apply the law as it is explained to them in the instructions they are given by the trial judge. They are not free to conjure up the law for themselves. Thus, a failure to instruct the jury regarding the defendant's theory of the case precludes the jury from considering the defendant's defense to the charges against him. Permitting a defendant to offer > a defense is of little value if the jury is not informed that the defense, if it is believed or if it helps create a reasonable doubt in the jury's mind, will entitle the defendant to a judgment of acquittal." (Escobar De Bright, supra, 742 F.2d at pp. 1201-1202.)

The analysis in Escobar De Bright is entirely consistent with that which has been subsequently posited by the Supreme Court. The court has indicated that per se reversal is required when an error "vitiates all the jury's findings." (Sullivan v. Louisiana, supra, 508 U.S. 275, 281, emphasis in original.) Or, stated otherwise, per se reversal is compelled when the consequences of an error "are necessarily unquantifiable." (Id., at p. 282; accord, Neder v. United States (1999) 527 U.S. 1, 10-11.) Since it is impossible to know whether a jury would have accepted a defense which it never had occasion to consider, the conclusion is inescapable that the effect of the instructional omission is "necessarily unquantifiable." (See Conde v. Henry (9th Cir. 1999) 198 F.3d 734, 740-741 [structural error found where the defense was precluded from presenting its "theory of the case;"] United States v. Sarno (9th Cir. 1995) 73 F.3d 1470, 1485 ["failure to instruct a jury upon a legally and factually cognizable defense is not subject to harmless error analysis. [Citations."].)

However, a California Court is unlikely to be persuaded by these authorities, and will probably apply a harmless error analysis. In addition to arguing the error is structural, appellate counsel should alternatively argue the error was prejudicial under harmless-error standards.

B. The California rule.

Historically, People v. Modesto (1963) 59 Cal.2d 722 is the most important case on the subject of prejudice. In Modesto, the court held that a defendant has a state constitutional right to have the jury determine every material issue presented by the evidence. (Id., at p. 730.) Given this constitutional right, subsequent cases went on to apply a standard of per se reversal (with specified exceptions) when the trial court failed to instruct on a lesser included offense, an affirmative defense or an element of the crime. (See People v. Croy (1985) 41 Cal.3d 1, 12-13; People v. Garcia (1984) 36 Cal.3d 539, 550-558 and cases cited therein.) The traditional rule is still good law in some respects, but not others.

Under current California law, the failure to instruct on a lesser included offense has been held to be mere state law error which does not implicate the federal Constitution. (People v. Breverman (1998) 19 Cal.4th 142, 149.) Although the failure to instruct on an element of the offense constitutes federal constitutional error, reversal is not required absent a showing of prejudice. (People v. Flood (1998) 18 Cal.4th 470, 475.) In some cases, the failure to instruct on a lesser included offense can be viewed as a failure to instruct on an element of the offense. I f that argument can be made, the federal constitution is violated. (See People v. Thomas (2013) 218 Cal.App.4th 630.) Furthermore, the California Supreme Court has not specifically renounced its former reversible per se rule in two respects.

1. The failure to instruct on an affirmative defense is arguably almost reversible per se.

The longstanding rule is that the omission to instruct on an affirmative defense constitutes reversible error unless "'the factual question posed by the omitted instruction was necessarily resolved adversely to the defendant under other, properly given instructions.' [Citation.]" (People v. Stewart (1976) 16 Cal.3d 133, 141; accord, People v. Lee (1987) 43 Cal.3d 666, 675, fn. 1.) Theer is a "harmless error" component to this standard, but it is very limited, as only other verdicts may be considered in deciding whether the error is harmless. since Notwithstanding the cited cases, the Supreme Court has recently stated that it has "not yet determined what test of prejudice applies to the failure to instruct on an affirmative defense. [Citation.]" (People v. Salas (2006) 37 Cal.4th 967, 984.) Given this conflict in the case law, it may still be fairly argued that per se reversal is required. Nonetheless, it is likely that the Supreme Court will adopt a lesser standard in the near future. (See People v. Quach (2004) 116 Cal.App.4th 294, 303 [error in self defense instruction required application of the federal standard found in Chapman v. California (1967) 386 U.S. 18].)

2. An error of law in the government's theory of the case was, until recently, also subject to virtual per se reversal.

In People v. Guiton (1993) 4 Cal.4th 1116, the Supreme Court addressed the situation where the government relies on both proper and erroneous legal theories at trial. As to legally erroneous theories, the court held that reversal is required unless the reviewing court can determine beyond a reasonable doubt the jury in fact based its conviction on a legally valid theory. (Id., at pp. 1128-1129; accord, People v. Morgan (2007) 42 Cal.4th 593, 612-613.) However, as to factually inadequate theories, it remains the defendant's obligation to establish prejudice under the standard of People v. Watson (1956) 46 Cal.2d 818.

However, in People v. Chun (2009) 45 Cal.4th 1179, the Supreme Court explained the error identified in Guiton - instructing the jury on a legally invalid theory - is subject to a broader harmless error test. Instruction on an erroneous legal theory can be deemed harmless "'only if the jury verdict on other points effectively embraces this one or if it is impossible, upon the evidence, to have found what the verdict did find without finding this point as well.' [Citation.]" (Id. at p. 1204.) "If other aspects of the verdict or the evidence leave no reasonable doubt that the jury made the findings" under a legally adequate theory, the error is harmless. (Id. at p. 1205, italics added.)

In applying Chun and Guiton, obviously it is better to label the error as instructing on a legally inadequate theory, rather than a factually inadequate theory. The distinction is not necessarily clear. Every effort should be made to argue the error involves a legally inadequate theory. An example given in Guiton indicates that many errors can be reasonably categorized as sounding in law.

In Guiton, the court cited People v. Green (1980) 27 Cal.3d 1. There, the defendant was convicted of kidnapping. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the trial court had erred by allowing the prosecutor to argue that moving the victim 90 feet was sufficient to satisfy the asportation element of kidnapping. Guiton found the error in Green was one of law, not of fact

> "The Green rule, as applied to the facts of that case, is readily construed as coming within the former category of a `legally inadequate theory' generally requiring reversal. At issue was whether 90 feet was sufficient asportation to satisfy the elements, or the `statutory definition,' of kidnapping. There was no insufficiency of proof in the sense that there clearly was evidence from which a jury could find that the victim had been asported the 90 feet. Instead, we held that the distance was `legally insufficient.' [Citation.]" (People v. Guiton, supra, 4 Cal.4th at p. 1128, emphasis in original.)

As the quoted analysis reveals, it is not intuitively obvious whether an error is one of fact or law. Thus, appellate counsel should dare to be creative when appropriate. In this way, counsel may be able to obtain the benefit of a strict reversal standard subject to a limited exception. Even under Chun it should be difficult for the People to demonstrate that the jury's verdict unequivocally included the necessary findings on a proper legal theory.

Finally, it is worth noting that the U.S. Supreme Court has recently renounced its former reliance on a standard of per se reversal where the jury has been instructed on an erroneous legal theory. (Hedgpeth v. Pulido (2008) 555 U.S. 57.) Thus, an error in instructing on an erroneous legal theory is subject to the Chapman standard in federal court. (Ibid.)

II. PROPERLY APPLIED, THE CHAPMAN STANDARD SHOULD LEAD TO MANY REVERSALS.

In the seminal case of Chapman v. California, supra, 386 U.S. 18, the U.S. Supreme Court announced that a finding of federal constitutional error requires reversal unless the government can "prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the error complained of did not contribute to the verdict obtained." (Id., at p. 24.) In order to understand what this test truly means, it is highly instructive to review the facts in Chapman.

Although the facts were not fully recited by the U.S. Supreme Court, they can be found in the antecedent opinion of the California Supreme Court. (People v. Teale (1965) 63 Cal.2d 178.) At 2 a.m. on the morning of October 18, 1962, Ms. Chapman, Mr. Teale and Mr. Adcox were seen outside the bar where Mr. Adcox was employed as a bartender. Later that morning, Mr. Adcox' body was found in a remote area. He had been shot in the head three times. Mr. Adcox was killed with .22 caliber bullets and Ms. Chapman had purchased a .22 caliber weapon six days earlier. In close vicinity to the body, the police found a check which had been signed by Ms. Chapman.

The most important evidence against the defendants was of a forensic nature. According to the government's expert, blood found in the defendants' car was of Mr. Adcox' type. In addition, hairs matching those of Mr. Adcox were found in the car along with fibers from his shoes.

If this evidence was not enough, the government also presented an informant who testified to Mr. Teale's statements. Essentially, Mr. Teale told the informant that he and Ms. Chapman had robbed and killed Mr. Adcox.

For her part, Ms. Chapman gave a statement to the police. In so doing, she lied and claimed that she was in San Francisco at the time of the killing. The falsity of this account was proved by the fact that Ms. Chapman had registered at a Woodland motel shortly after Mr. Adcox' demise.

At trial, neither defendant testified. In manifest violation of the federal Constitution, the prosecutor repeatedly argued to the jury that the silence of the defendants could be used against them. (Griffin v. California (1965) 380 U.S. 609, 615.) On this record, the U.S. Supreme Court found reversible error:

> "[A]bsent the constitutionally forbidden comments, honest, fair-minded jurors might very well have brought in not-guilty verdicts. Under these circumstances, it is completely impossible for us to say that the State has demonstrated, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the prosecutor's comments and the trial judge's instruction did not contribute to petitioners' convictions." (Chapman, supra, 386 U.S. at p. 26.)

The foregoing recitation of the Chapman facts and holding leads to an inescapable conclusion: The Supreme Court intended that it would be very difficult for the government to show that a federal constitutional error was harmless. As is readily apparent, the government had a very strong case in Chapman including a confession, evidence of the opportunity to commit the crime, highly incriminating forensic evidence and consciousness of guilt evidence. Nonetheless, the strength of this evidence was not sufficient to avoid reversal.

Having defined the Chapman test and its intended application, it must be emphasized that the appellate courts of today are loathe to apply the Chapman standard as set forth by the Supreme Court. Despite citations in appellate opinions to Chapman, any experienced appellate lawyer knows that today's actual test is the "he's good for it" standard. Under this test, the appellate justices review the evidence and generally conclude that, regardless of any federal constitutional error, the defendant is guilty. Hence, since the defendant is "good for it," any and all errors may be excused. In light of this reality, three points are in order.

First, since most defendants have better factual cases than did the defendants in Chapman, counsel should compare and contrast the Chapman facts with those in the case before the court.

Second, it must be emphasized that Chapman contemplates an inquiry into the impact which the particular error has had on the instant jury. This is true regardless of the weight of the evidence.

> "[T]he question [Chapman] instructs the reviewing court to consider is not what effect the constitutional error might generally be expected to have upon a reasonable jury, but rather what effect it had upon the guilty verdict in the case at hand. [Citation.] Harmless-error review looks, we have said, to the basis on which `the jury actually rested its verdict.' [Citation.] The inquiry, in other words, is not whether, in a trial that occurred without the error, a guilty verdict would surely have been rendered, but whether the guilty verdict actually rendered in this trial was surely unattributable to the error." (Sullivan v. Louisiana, supra, 508 U.S. 275, 279, emphasis in original.)

As the foregoing quotation reveals, the mere existence of strong government evidence does not ipso facto lead to a conclusion of harmless error. To the contrary, if the government has committed a fundamental constitutional error bearing a substantial impact (such as the Griffin error in Chapman), reversal is compelled. This is so since it is the government's burden to show that the guilty verdict "was surely unattributable to the error." (Sullivan, supra, 508 U.S. at p. 279; accord, People v. Quartermain (1997) 16 Cal.4th 600, 621.)

People v. Fletcher (1996) 13 Cal.4th 451 is an example of the proper application of the Chapman test. In Fletcher, the government presented a strong case that Mr. Moard accompanied Mr. Fletcher when he killed a woman whose car was stopped on a freeway entrance ramp late at night. On appeal, Mr. Moard argued that his right to confrontation had been violated by admission of Mr. Fletcher's extrajudicial statement in which he indicated that he and a "friend" had intended to rob the victim. After finding that the statement was improperly admitted against Mr. Moard, the Supreme Court found prejudice since there was quite simply a paucity of evidence to establish that Mr. Moard had the requisite mental state to assist Mr. Fletcher in his criminal scheme. (Id. at p. 470.)

The result in Fletcher is an important one. All too often, reversal is not found under Chapman on the grounds that the evidence was "overwhelming." In Fletcher, the court could have reverted to this mantra since it was certainly highly suspicious that Mr. Moard was out on a freeway ramp at 2:30 a.m. However, notwithstanding this rather suspicious circumstance, reversal was ordered. Given this application of the Chapman test, similar results should be required in a significant number of cases.

Keep in mind all errors are not created equal. Some errors (such as the admission of a defendant's confession) are so devastating that reversal is virtually always required. (See Arizona v. Fulminate, supra, 499 U.S. 279, 295-302 [erroneous admission of defendant's confession required reversal even though a second confession was properly admitted].) Thus, even when the evidence against a defendant is strong, a particular error may still require reversal in light of its power to influence the jury. (United States v. Harrison (9th Cir. 1994) 34 F.3d 886, 892 ["[r]eview for harmless error requires not only an evaluation of the remaining incriminating evidence in the record, but also `"the most perceptive reflections as to the probabilities of the effect of error on a reasonable trier of fact."' [Citation.]."].)

Third, it is worth noting that the great Justice Harlan expressly refuted the "he's good for it" standard long before it came into vogue. In a case involving the unlawful seizure of a gun, Justice Harlan said:

> "Finally, if I were persuaded that the admission of the gun was `harmless error,' I would vote to affirm, and if I were persuaded that it was arguably harmless error, I would vote to remand the case for state consideration of the point. But the question cannot be whether, in the view of this Court, the defendant actually committed the crimes charged, so that the error was `harmless' in the sense that petitioner got what he deserved. The question is whether the error was such that it cannot be said that petitioner's guilt was adjudicated on the basis of constitutionally admissible evidence, which means, in this case, whether the properly admissible evidence was such that the improper admission of the gun could not have affected the result." (Bumper v. North Carolina (1968) 391 U.S. 543, 553 (conc. opn. of Harlan, J.), emphasis added.)

In short, the Chapman standard was devised to ensure that the government does not profit from its own violations of the Constitution. As counsel for the defendant, it is our duty to strongly advocate for the vitality of the Chapman test as it was truly meant to be.

A. Counsel Should Carefully Review The Case Authority On Point In Order To Take Advantage Of Any Mode Of Analysis Which Is Peculiar To The Particular Issue In The Case.

Occasionally, the U.S. Supreme Court will place a special gloss on the application of the Chapman test. Three examples come to mind.

In Neder v. United States, supra, 527 U.S. 1, the court held that the Chapman standard is to be applied when the trial court has erred by failing to instruct on an element of the offense. However, the court specified a very demanding standard which the government must meet before the omission can be deemed harmless. The court held that the error can be deemed harmless only when the record contains "overwhelming" and "uncontroverted" evidence regarding the element. (Id. at pp. 17-18.) Conversely, the error is prejudicial if "the defendant contested the omitted element and raised evidence sufficient to support a contrary finding . . ." (Id. at p. 19.)

The significance of the cited language is profound. So long as the record shows some evidentiary basis for a finding in the defendant's favor, reversal is required. In a proper case, a skillful use of Neder should lead to reversal.

Another example of a more expansive application of the Chapman test is an error involving a jury instruction which contains a mandatory presumption. While this error allows for harmless error review, affirmance is permitted only when the record shows that "the jury actually rested its verdict on evidence establishing the presumed fact beyond a reasonable doubt, independently of the presumption." (Yates v. Evatt (1991) 500 U.S. 391, 404.) In the usual case, it will be very difficult for the government to satisfy this test.

A final example of an expanded application of the Chapman standard is found in a Confrontation Clause context. In Coy v. Iowa (1988) 487 U.S 1012, the trial court erred by placing a large screen between testifying witnesses and the defendant. In measuring the prejudice flowing from this error, the court held that the witnesses' testimony had to be disregarded.

> "An assessment of harmlessness cannot include consideration of whether the witness's testimony would have been unchanged, or the jury's assessment unaltered, had there been confrontation; such an inquiry would obviously involve pure speculation, and harmlessness must therefore be determined on the basis of the remaining evidence." (Coy, supra, 487 U.S. at pp. 1021-1022.)

The foregoing examples are not intended to be exhaustive. Rather, the point is that creative appellate counsel can sometimes obtain stricter forms of harmless error review depending upon the nature of the error at issue. Counsel should be ever sensitive to this possibility.

Keep in mind if you ever pursue one of your California cases in federal court you will be subject to different standards under AEDPA (28 U.S.C. section 2254(d)(1)) and*Brecht v. Abrahamson* (1993) 507 U.S. 619. A federal habeas petitioner may obtain relief only upon a showing that the error "`had substantial and injurious effect or influence in determining the jury's verdict.' [Citation.]" (Id., at p. 623.)

V. THE SPECIAL TEST FOR INEFFECTIVE ASSISTANCE OF COUNSEL.

Keep in mind the U.S. Supreme Court has developed a harmless error test for ineffective assistance of counsel which is of a hybrid nature. While this test is not as favorable as the Chapman standard, it is certainly more helpful to the defense than is generally recognized.

In Strickland v. Washington, supra, 466 U.S. 668, the Supreme Court held that an error made by defense counsel will require reversal when "there is a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's unprofessional errors, the result of the proceeding would have been different." (Id., at p. 694.) This test is not outcome-determinative and does not require the defendant to show "that counsel's deficient conduct more likely than not altered the outcome in the case." (Id., at p. 693.) Rather, the defense need only show that counsel's errors were "sufficient to undermine confidence in the outcome" of the trial. (Id., at p. 694.)

Although the Strickland standard was not intended to be a precise one, the Fourth District has issued an opinion which defines the standard in a concrete manner. "In statistical terms, we believe Strickland requires a significant but something-less-than-50 percent likelihood of a more favorable verdict." (People v. Howard (1987) 190 Cal.App.3d 41, 48.) As Howard recognizes, a defendant need only show a "significant" doubt that he was given a fair trial. Since this doubt need not rise to the level of probability, this is a favorable test when it is fairly applied. (See Williams v. Taylor (2000) 529 U.S. 362, 405-406; [Strickland standard is satisfied by a showing of proof which is less than a preponderance of the evidence.].)

Also, a claim of per se reversal may be made when defense "counsel entirely fails to subject the prosecution's case to meaningful adversarial testing, . . ." (United States v. Cronic (1984) 466 U.S. 648, 659.) If the trial attorney did little or nothing on the client's behalf, appellate counsel should argue for per se reversal. (See Javor v. United States (9th Cir. 1984) 724 F.2d 831, 833-835 [per se reversal was required when defense counsel slept through substantial portions of the trial]; see also Frazer v. United States, supra, 18 F.3d 778, 785 [collecting cases where Cronic was applied]; but see Bell v. Cone (2002) 535 U.S. 685, 697-

698 [the failure to present mitigating evidence at the sentencing phase of a capital trial and the waiver of closing argument with respect to penalty did not implicate the Cronic rule].)

VI. WHENEVER POSSIBLE, APPELLATE COUNSEL SHOULD CATEGORIZE A TRIAL ERROR AS BEING ONE OF FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL STATURE.

A claim of federal constitutional error obtains a much more favorable standard for harmless error analysis than does a claim of state error. State error only requires revesal if it appears from an examination of the entire record that there is a reasonable probability the defendant would have obtained a more favorable outcome absent the error. (People v. Watson, supra, 46 Cal.2d at p. 836.) Moreover, if a federal claim fails on a state appeal, it may be taken to federal court whereas a state error may not. Given these realities, one of the primary duties of appellate counsel is to raise a claim of error under the federal Constitution if it is at all possible to do so. Although this article is not intended to thoroughly exhaust the subject, a few examples will be shown as to how routine state law error can be transformed into a federal constitutional claim.

As a preliminary point, it should be noted that trial attorneys often fail to specify that their objections are being made under the federal Constitution. As a result, the appellate court will usually find that any argument based on the federal Constitution has been forfeited. (See People v. Gordon (1990) 50 Cal.3d 1223, 1254, fn. 6 [admission of extrajudicial statement was reviewed only under the Watson standard since a "federal constitutional right of confrontation" objection was not made at trial]; but see People v. Partida (2005) 37 Cal.4th 428, 433-439 [federal due process argument may be made for the first time on appeal when the alleged consequence of overruling an Evidence Code section 352 objection was to deny the defendant a fair trial].)

Given the appellate courts' inclination to find forfeiture, it is incumbent upon appellate counsel to raise a claim of ineffective assistance of trial counsel when an adequate federal objection was not made at trial. In this way, a federal claim can be preserved when it would otherwise be lost.

As a final procedural point, it is important to note that a claim may not be raised in federal court unless it was expressly raised in state court as a federal claim. (Duncan v. Henry (1995) 513 U.S. 364, 366; accord, Baldwin v. Reese (2004) 541 U.S. 27, 29.) Thus, appellate counsel should be sure to specifically cite to both the federal Constitution and federal Supreme Court cases on a state appeal. Absent such citations, a federal court will refuse to entertain the case. (Duncan, supra, 513 U.S. at pp. 364-366 [Supreme Court held that federal relief was not available since the defendant relied solely on the Watson standard on his California appeal]; Baldwin, supra, 541 U.S. at pp. 31-34 [federal claim of ineffective assistance of counsel was forfeited since federal Constitution was not cited in petition for review in Oregon Supreme Court].)

Turning to the substantive law, evidentiary error provides the most fertile area for transforming generic state error into a federal constitutional claim. In this regard, the constitutional foundation is found in either the Sixth Amendment's compulsory process and confrontation clauses or the Fourteenth Amendment's due process clause. (See Crane v. Kentucky (1986) 476 U.S. 683, 690.) Under these provisions, a state court commits federal constitutional error when it excludes highly relevant and necessary defense evidence. (Ibid., see also Rock v. Arkansas (1987) 483 U.S. 44, 53-56.) Importantly, a federal claim may be made even if no error was made under state law.

Chambers v. Mississippi (1973) 410 U.S. 284 illustrates this principle. There, the defendant sought to admit a confession made by a third party. Under state law, the confession was inadmissible under the hearsay rule. Notwithstanding this well established state rule, the Supreme Court held that exclusion of the confession constituted a violation of the due process clause.

> "The testimony rejected by the trial court here bore persuasive assurances of trustworthiness and thus was well within the basic rationale of the exception for declarations against interest. That testimony also was critical to Chambers' defense. In these circumstances, where constitutional rights directly affecting the ascertainment of guilt are implicated, the hearsay rule may not be applied mechanistically to defeat the ends of justice." (Chambers, supra, 410 U.S. at p. 302.)

Chambers establishes a clear rule. So long as the defendant can demonstrate that he cannot receive a fair trial absent the admission of important evidence, the federal Constitution is implicated. This is so regardless of the exact form which the evidence takes. (Rock v. Arkansas, supra, 483 U.S. 44, 56-62 [exclusion of defendant's hypnotically enhanced testimony was violative of her constitutional right to testify]; Crane v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 683, 687-692 [exclusion of evidence regarding the circumstances surrounding the defendant's confession violated his right to confront the witnesses against him].)

A case handled by SDAP Executive Director Michael Kresser further illustrates the usefulness of the foregoing authorities. In Franklin v. Henry (9th Cir. 1997) 122 F.3d 1270, the defendant was charged with molesting a friend's daughter. In order to impeach the daughter's testimony, the defendant sought to introduce her prior false claim that her mother had molested her. Although it found that the trial court had erred by excluding the evidence, the Sixth District declared the error to be harmless under Evidence Code section 354. (People v. Franklin (1994) 25 Cal.App.4th 328, 336-337.) Importantly, the court failed to address the defense contention that the error rose to the level of a federal constitutional violation. Thankfully, the Ninth Circuit did not ignore the claim. Instead, finding that "[e]xclusion of the evidence deprived Franklin `of the basic right to have the prosecutor's case encounter and "survive the crucible of meaningful testing"' [citations]," the court reversed the judgment. (Franklin, 122 F.3d at p. 1273.)

As Franklin shows, a diligent effort can sometimes yield a dramatic victory. In Franklin, a claim of evidentiary error was carefully federalized in state court. While the state court failed to acknowledge the federal nature of the error, the Ninth Circuit later granted relief. While most of our clients will not be as lucky as Mr. Franklin, appellate counsel should still be inspired by that case.

Another example of turning state error into a federal contention may be found in the area of prosecutorial misconduct. (People v. Hill (1998) 17 Cal.4th 800, 823, fn. 1.) Two possible theories exist.

First, as the U.S. Supreme Court has indicated, a prosecutor's misconduct may be so egregious that it rises to the level of a due process violation. (Darden v. Wainwright (1986) 477 U.S. 168, 181.) Thus, in any case where the prosecutor engages in substantial misconduct, a federal claim should be advanced. (See People v. Samayoa (1997) 15 Cal.4th 795, 841 ["`" [a] prosecutor's . . . intemperate behavior violates the federal Constitution when it comprises a pattern of conduct `so egregious that it infects the trial with such unfairness as to make the conviction a denial of due process.'" [Citations.]."].)

Aside from a global due process claim, some types of prosecutorial misconduct may violate specific constitutional rights. For example, if the prosecutor refers to facts outside the record, he is effectively acting as an unsworn witness who has not been subjected to cross-examination. (People v. Bolton (1979) 23 Cal.3d 208, 214-215, fn. 4.) Under these circumstances, a Sixth Amendment violation is shown. (Ibid.; accord People v. Johnson (1981) 121 Cal.App.3d 94, 104.)

Finally, there is authority for the proposition that cumulative prejudice flowing from mere state error can result in a federal due process claim. For example, this can occur "where the violation of a state's evidentiary rule has resulted in the denial of fundamental fairness, thereby violating due process, . . ." (Cooper v. Sowders (6th Cir. 1988) 837 F.2d 284, 286; see also Lincoln v. Sunn (9th Cir. 1987) 807 F.2d 805, 814, fn. 6.) When the record shows that substantial error infected the proceedings, counsel should not hesitate to argue that the defendant was denied a fair trial under the federal due process clause.

As the foregoing survey demonstrates, garden variety state error can be the basis for a viable federal contention. Appellate counsel should strive to be as creative as is reasonably possible in order to develop and preserve federal constitutional claims.

VII. UNDER PEOPLE V. WATSON, SUPRA, 46 CAL.2D 818, REVERSAL IS WARRANTED FOR ANY ERROR WHICH UNDERMINES CONFIDENCE IN THE RESULT OF THE TRIAL COURT PROCEEDINGS.

Under Article VI, section 13 of the California Constitution, a judgment may not be reversed on appeal absent a showing that an error resulted "in a miscarriage of justice." As interpreted by the California Supreme Court, this provision means that a reversal may not be awarded absent a showing "that it is reasonably probable that a result more favorable to the appealing party would have been reached in the absence of the error." (People v. Watson, supra, 46 Cal.2d 818, 836.) Under Watson, a reasonable probability "does not mean more likely than not, but merely a reasonable chance, more than an abstract possibility. [Citations.]" (College Hospital, Inc. v. Superior Court (1994) 8 Cal.4th 704, 715, emphasis in original.) Prejudice must be found under Watson whenever the defendant can "'undermine confidence'" in the result achieved at trial. (Ibid.)

In applying the Watson test, an evenly balanced case is one which the defendant is entitled to win."But the fact that there exists at least such an equal balance of reasonable probabilities necessarily means that the court is of the opinion `that it is reasonably probable that a result more favorable to the appealing party would have been reached in the absence of the error.'" (Watson, supra, 46 Cal.2d at p. 837.)

Although Watson itself does not make this point, experience teaches that an appellate court has a great deal of discretion in determining whether a particular error requires reversal under the reasonable probability standard. As will be discussed in the next section, appellate counsel should marshall as many signs of prejudice as is possible in a given case.

VIII. REGARDLESS OF THE APPLICABLE HARMLESS ERROR TEST, THERE ARE A NUMBER OF OBJECTIVE FACTORS WHICH MAY BE USED TO SHOW PREJUDICE IN A PARTICULAR CASE.

After handling appeals for a number of years, an appellate attorney will become familiar with the appellate courts' mantra that the errors were harmless because the evidence was "overwhelming." While the evidence is truly overwhelming in some cases, the reality is that many jury trial cases involve shaky government witnesses, weak circumstantial evidence or some other evidentiary deficiency. In these cases, it is imperative that appellate counsel focus on the objective factors found in the record which demonstrate the case against the defendant was not overwhelming. Although the following examples are not exhaustive, they are indicative of some of the factors which will enable a defendant to obtain a reversal.

In advancing a prejudice argument, the primary goal of appellate counsel must be to dissect the evidentiary weaknesses in the government's case. If a government witness was granted immunity or was impeached in a substantial way, this point should be discussed.

Similarly, if there were inconsistencies in the government's case, this reality should be exposed. Indeed, any and all weaknesses in the government's case must be carefully and precisely laid out for the reader.

Appellate counsel should also discuss the strength of the defense evidence. If no such evidence was presented, counsel should set forth the contents of defense counsel's closing argument. In so doing, counsel can hopefully show that the defense presented a relatively credible theory to the jury. If this goal is achieved, it will, of course, make it very difficult for the appellate court to legitimately conclude that the government's evidence was "overwhelming."

It is important to note that some errors are better than others. For example, errors in the admission of the defendant's confession or evidence that the defendant was a gang member or a drug addict, are highly prejudicial regardless of the strength of the government's case. (Arizona v. Fulminante, supra, 499 U.S. 279 ["'the defendant's own confession is probably the most probative and damaging evidence that can be admitted against him'"]; People v. Cardenas (1982) 31 Cal.3d 897, 904-907 [admission of gang evidence leads to "a substantial danger of undue prejudice;" admission of evidence of narcotics addiction is "`catastrophic.'"].) Thus, appellate counsel should strive to find those case authorities which depict a particular error as being one which necessarily involves a high degree of prejudice.

Turning to the case specific factors which may serve to show prejudice, the most obvious indication of a close case is lengthy jury deliberations. (People v. Cardenas, supra, 31 Cal.3d 897, 907 [six hours of deliberations is evidence of a close case]; Lawson v. Borg (9th Cir. 1995) 60 F.3d 608, 612 [nine hours of deliberations "deemed protracted."].) While the Supreme Court has indicated that lengthy deliberations are not significant in a complex case (People v. Cooper (1991) 53 Cal.3d 771, 837), such deliberations in a short case can only mean that the jurors found some deficiency in the government's case. When the jury is troubled by the case, the appellate court is required to take heed. (Sullivan v. Louisiana, supra, 508 U.S. 275, 279 [harmless error analysis requires the court to look at the impact of an error on the jury]; see also People v. Filson (1994) 22 Cal.App.4th 1841, 1852; overruled on an unrelated point in People v. Martinez (1995) 11 Cal.4th 434, 452 [reversal ordered where the length of the jury deliberations exceeded the length of the evidentiary phase of the trial].)

Another indication of a close case involving the jury's behavior is where there has previously been a hung jury. Obviously, this fact demonstrates that the government's case is less than overwhelming. (People v. Brooks (1979) 88 Cal.App.3d 180, 188.) Moreover, if a defendant is convicted on erroneously admitted evidence which was not presented to the hung jury, the inference is virtually compelled that the evidentiary error is prejudicial. (People v. Ozuna (1963) 213 Cal.App.2d 338, 342.)

Aside from hanging, a jury may show that the government's case is weak when it acquits the defendant on one or more counts. In such a circumstance, an error relating to the count of conviction should be deemed prejudicial. (People v. Epps (1981) 122 Cal.App.3d 691, 698; People v. Washington (1958) 163 Cal.App.2d 833, 846.)

Even if the jury eventually convicts the defendant, its requests for additional instructions or the readback of testimony may establish that the case was a close one. (People v. Filson, supra, 22 Cal.App.4th 1841, 1852 [request for additional instructions]; People v. Pearch (1991) 229 Cal.App.3d 1282, 1295 ["[j]uror questions and requests to have testimony reread are indications the deliberations were close. [Citations.].]"; People v. Williams (1971) 22 Cal.App.3d 34, 38-40 [request for readback of critical testimony].) Moreover, if the jury hears an erroneous instruction or erroneously admitted testimony for a second time, it is manifest that the degree of prejudice to the defendant was only heightened. (People v. Williams (1976) 16 Cal.3d 663, 669 [reversal ordered where the jury requested a rereading of an erroneously admitted statement and then quickly returned a guilty verdict]; see also LeMons v. Regents of University of California (1978) 21 Cal.3d 869, 876 [rereading of an erroneous instruction warrants reversal]; People v. Thompkins (1987) 195 Cal.App.3d 244, 249-252 [erroneous response to a deliberating jury's question requires reversal].)

Regardless of the behavior of the jury, reversible error is likely to be found when the trial court has effectively precluded the defendant from presenting his case. This is so since errors "`at a trial that deprive a litigant of the opportunity to present his version of the case . . . are . . . ordinarily reversible, since there is no way of evaluating whether or not they affected the judgment.' [Citation.]" (People v. Spearman (1979) 25 Cal.3d 107, 119.) Thus, when the trial court excludes evidence bearing on the defendant's theory of the case, reversal is appropriate. (People v. Filson, supra, 22 Cal.App.4th 1841, 1852.) Moreover, "[t]he exclusion of the evidence bearing on the credibility of a prosecution witness where only the witness and defendant are percipient witnesses has been held to be prejudicial error. [Citations.]" (People v. Randle (1982) 130 Cal.App.3d 286, 293.)

Conversely, if an error impacts in a strongly negative way on the defendant's theory of the case, reversal should also be the result. For example, where the defendant presented a diminished capacity defense in a murder case, the inadmissible "statements which intimated that appellant was fabricating his defense were most prejudicial." (People v. Rucker (1980) 26 Cal.3d 368, 391; see also People v. Wagner (1975) 13 Cal.3d 612, 621 [erroneous impeachment of defendant required reversal since "the resolution of defendant's guilt or innocence turned on his credibility . . ."]; People v. Vargas (1973) 9 Cal.3d 470, 481 [Griffin error is prejudicial if it touches a "`live nerve'" in the defense].)

In contending that an error was prejudicial, appellate counsel can often find a great deal of ammunition in the prosecutor's closing argument. If the prosecutor placed a great deal of reliance on an erroneous instruction or an erroneously admitted piece of evidence, the appellate court will have a difficult time in honestly finding that the error was harmless. (People v. Cruz (1964) 61 Cal.2d 861, 868 ["[t]here is no reason why we should treat this evidence as any less `crucial' than the prosecutor - and so presumably the jury - treated it];" see also People v. Woodard (1979) 23 Cal.3d 329, 341 [reversal ordered where the prosecutor "exploited" erroneously admitted evidence during his closing argument.]; LeMons v. Regents of University of California, supra, 21 Cal.3d 869, 876 [counsel exacerbated prejudice by arguing erroneous instruction to the jury].)

As a final technique for showing prejudice, appellate counsel should attempt to demonstrate in an appropriate case that a number of errors require reversal due to the cumulative prejudice which they caused. As our Supreme Court has said, "a series of trial errors, though independently harmless, may in some circumstances rise by accretion to the level of reversible and prejudicial error. [Citations.]" (People v. Hill, supra, 17 Cal.4th 800, 844.) Even in a case with strong government evidence, reversal may be obtained when "the sheer number of . . . legal errors raises the strong possibility the aggregate prejudicial effect of such errors was greater than the sum of the prejudice of each error standing alone. [Citation.]" (Id., at p. 845; see also Chambers v. Mississippi, supra, 410 U.S. 284, 302-303; Parle v. Runnels (9th Cir. 2007) 505 F.3d 922, 927-928.)

When a claim of cumulative prejudice is raised, it is necessary to advance the point as a separate issue under the federal Constitution. If the issue is not preserved in this manner, it will not be cognizable on federal habeas. (Wooten v. Kirkland (9th Cir. 2008) 540 F.3d 1010, 1026 [cumulative prejudice claim was rejected since it was not specifically pled in the state petition for review].)

After reviewing the foregoing survey of the case law, appellate counsel should employ it as a starting point, not an end. Each case is somewhat unique. While counsel should be familiar with the law, it is more important to closely study the record to see exactly how a particular error affected the dynamics of a trial. By being sensitive to the effect of an error in a particular case, appellate counsel can often prepare a persuasive claim of prejudicial error.

IX. A FEW WORDS ABOUT THE METHODOLOGY OF PRESENTING A PREJUDICE ARGUMENT.

The skillful practice of appellate law is not limited to the mere citation of applicable authority and the rote recitation of the facts of the case. Rather, the best lawyers are those who employ superior techniques to actually persuade the reader that an injustice occurred in the trial court. A few of these techniques will be briefly described below.

A. The Facts Uber Alles

A successful showing of prejudice depends upon a careful massaging of the facts. While counsel must, of course, include all of the critical facts which support the judgment, it is imperative that the facts which support the defense theory of the case be prominently displayed.

First, the brief should start with an Introduction. In this section, the defense narrative should be set forth with due regard for the People's version. Without misleading the reader, counsel should emphasize the key facts which point towards innocence or a miscarriage of justice. In this way, the appellate justices and their law clerks will be primed to pay close attention to the defense version of what transpired at trial.

Second, the helpful facts should saturate the brief. Without being heavy handed, counsel can highlight a good fact in at least four places: (1) the Introduction; (2) the Statement of Facts; (3) the discussion of the legal error; and (4) the discussion of prejudice. By careful repetition, the defense facts will come to predominate the reader's thinking.

Third, the facts must ultimately be placed in the context of the proof beyond a reasonable doubt standard. Insofar as appellate courts have a propensity to find that the evidence of guilt was "overwhelming," the goal of appellate counsel is to demonstrate that there was actually a reasonable doubt about the defendant's guilt. If such a doubt can be raised, a reversal may result.

B. Comparing The Case As It Was Litigated With The Case As It Would Have Been Litigated Were It Fairly Tried.

As a matter of both logic and common sense, a showing of prejudice can be made by comparing the trial which occurred with the one which would have transpired had error not infested the trial court proceedings. The merit of this approach is illustrated by a case which was briefed not long ago.

The defendant resided in a two bedroom house with her ex-husband. The government adduced evidence that a substantial amount of drugs was found in a bedroom and outdoor shed. Although defense counsel was aware that the defendant was estranged from her husband and that he alone had dominion and control over the bedroom and shed, counsel failed to call three witnesses who would have testified to these facts. Nonetheless, in his closing argument, defense counsel advanced the theory that the drugs belonged to the estranged husband. In his rebuttal argument, the prosecutor quite properly noted that the defense had presented "no evidence" to support its theory. On this record, prejudice could not be more amply demonstrated.

At the actual trial, defense counsel argued a theory which was not factually supported. In the plainest terms, the prosecutor told the jury that the defense theory had no factual basis. However, at the trial which would have occurred but for counsel's ineffective assistance, the defense theory would have been powerfully supported by three credible witnesses. A comparison of the two trials reveals an overwhelming showing of prejudice. (Murtishaw v. Woodford (9th Cir. 2001) 255 F.2d 926, 940 ["in order to determine whether counsel's errors prejudiced the outcome of the trial, 'it is essential to compare the evidence that actually was presented to the jury with the evidence that might have been presented had counsel acted differently.' [Citation.]"].)

The premise of any prejudice argument is that the result would have been different had error not occurred. By demonstrating that the trial would have been conducted in a distinctly different manner but for the error in question, appellate counsel should be able to persuasively argue that prejudice must be found.

C. Never Be Afraid To Appeal To The Justices' Better Angels

The ultimate goal of the judicial system is to see that justice is done. Of course, justice is a protean concept and judges are mere mortals. In order to achieve the goal, it is necessary to motivate the judges to do the right thing. Most judges believe that our judicial system is fair. If it can be shown that a particular legal proceeding was unfair, a remedy may be forthcoming regardless of the weight of the evidence.

People v. Hill, supra, 17 Cal.4th 800 is a paradigmatic case. In Hill, the prosecutor engaged in a pattern of misconduct at a capital trial which was hard to believe. The Supreme Court expressed its outrage by going so far as to note that the prosecutor in question had a long record of committing misconduct. (Id. at pp. 847-848.) Notwithstanding the fact that the defendant had stabbed a man to death, the judgment was reversed with the finding that the "sheer number of the instances of prosecutorial misconduct, together with the other trial errors, is profoundly troubling." (Id. at p. 847.)

The lesson of the Hill case is a simple one. Fair minded appellate justices are willing to reverse judgments when they are persuaded that some aspect of the proper functioning of the system has gone awry. In a proper case, counsel should not hesitate to argue that adherence to our constitutional principles demands a remedy.

D. Prejudice Can Sometimes Be Shown By Pointing To Something Which Is Unique About The Case At Bar.

Although only an occasional case falls within this category, it is sometimes possible to show prejudice by establishing that a particular aspect of the case caused harm to the defendant's case. People v. Criscione (1981) 125 Cal.3d 275 is such a case.

In Criscione, an Italian-American defendant was on trial for murder. The defense was that the defendant was mentally ill at the time of the killing. The prosecutor, who was an Italian-American, relentlessly asked questions for the "purpose of establishing that appellant's violent attitudes and conduct toward the victim, and women in general, were not symptomatic of mental disease, but merely the normal responses of a man raised in a traditional Italian culture." (Id. at p. 287.) Given this patent prosecutorial misconduct, the Court of Appeal reversed and ordered a new trial on the question of sanity. Interestingly, in his concurring opinion, Judge Figone (presumably an Italian-American) noted:

> "However, the felling blow in the prosecutor's appeal to ethnic prejudice came when in argument he gave personal opinions concerning the defendant's sanity, by referring to his understanding of Italians and, in particular, to his own wife. 'I hope my wife doesn't hear me say that. But that's not a sign of manicness.' The implication was, clearly, that he, as the prosecutor and an Italian-American, knew that the defendant acted as a sane > man, because Italian men normally abuse woman." (Criscione, supra, 125 Cal.App.3d at p. 297 (conc. opn. of Figone, J.).)

The stars in the galaxy will rarely align as well for a defendant as they did in Criscione. However, the case provides a clear example that prejudice can be shown by focusing on the highly unfair and unique circumstances of the case of bar.

CONCLUSION

Ultimately, the subject of prejudicial error boils down to a single question: Did the defendant receive a fair trial? Since unfairness means different things in different contexts, appellate counsel often has the opportunity to creatively demonstrate why a particular client was not treated fairly. Although it has become ever more difficult to obtain a reversal in today's appellate courts, the diligent pursuit of justice can be its own reward. Indeed, if we do not demand fairness in our judicial system, liberty will certainly cease to exist.
